The American Professional Football Association (APFA) in 1920

Note: This is the first season of the American Professional Football Association (APFA), later to be known as the National Football League (NFL), in its history that was not like the NFL we know of today. In this and a few years after that, the schedules were mostly informal, as some teams came into the league after the season began, but some other teams disbanded before it ended. Also not every team played the exact total number of games as the other teams. NFL standings, and their schedules, did not become official until 1933, and the league did not have every team play an identical number of games until 1936.

Shown here on this page is the final APFA standings for 1920 as recalled by historians; names of the APFA (NFL) head coaches appear following each year's standings.
